

WORKING WITH TROUBLED AND TROUBLESOME BOYS

A workshop for professionals working with young people

Boys get a bad press. They can be wonderful, dreadful, straightforward, complicated. They say they don't care when, clearly, they do.

This workshop will be about understanding and supporting the boys we work with, the boys who delight and disappoint us, who surprise and frustrate us. Amongst other themes, we'll explore boys and sex, schoolwork, intimacy, mother-figures, anger, dependency, father-figures, girls, groups, separation, sexuality.

The workshop is for professionals whose work includes supporting boys. It will include some theory but will also be a chance to look practically at the work we do with boys, the relationships we have with them and the difficult situations they find themselves in.

Workshop facilitator:

The workshop will be led by Nick Luxmoore. Nick is a trainer, school counsellor, teacher, youth worker and psychodrama psychotherapist (UKCP registered). He has nearly 40 years' experience of working with young people and with the professionals who support them.

Nick's career has included teaching English and Drama in schools and prisons, teaching counselling at Oxford Brookes University, running a youth centre and youth theatre, setting up and managing a young people's counselling and information service, working as a school counsellor and as a counsellor with young refugees and asylum seekers. He currently works as a freelance trainer and supervisor.

He is the author of a number of books about working with young people, with themes including anger, self-esteem, death, love and hate.
